Successful Collaboration
Collaboration is sometimes made to sound like an ultra-smooth process of people working together seamlessly toward a shared goal. The reality is that few collaborating teams work for long without a certain amount of arguing, dissenting, and emoting. Most of the time, this friction occurs for the simple reason that we differ from each other. We have different skills and experiences.

I have previously stated that collaboration is a classic SharePoint platitude, and chasing goals like “improved collaboration” are a sure fire way to create elaborate SharePoint solutions that miss the mark. Thus, this work by Wilder is a crucial resource in helping organisations determine what collaboration means to them. Furthermore, anyone interested in assessing SharePoint “readiness” (whatever your interpretation of readiness), would be well served to think about how they can ...
